

Architecture during the last few generations has become weakly sentimental, aesthetic and decorative. Its chief concern has been with ornamentation, with the formalistic use of motifs, ornaments and moldings on the exterior of the building ... We want an architecture adapted to our world of machines, radios and fast motor cars, an architecture whose function is clearly recognizable in the relation to its forms.

-Walter Gropius

